

frequent absence of gross pathology, also minor nervous disturbances in lower animals do not invite the same attention that they do in man. Nevertheless, there is much information available. Some of this has been collected not for the purpose of elucidating nervous conditions met by veterinarians but is data resulting from studies on dogs and other animals designed to throw light on the nervous system of man.

It is encouraging to note that in this small volume the author has collected much pertinent information and pointed out its application. The work is such that it will in part fill a long felt want and deserves to be in the library of all who are interested in the diseases of the dog.

ONE MAN IN HIS TIME

By N. M. BORODIN

This book is of special interest to veterinarians, in that the author had a distinguished career in the field of prevention of animal diseases, became a distinguished scientist and won the highest Russian decoration, the Order of Lenin. In 1945, he was sent to England and later to the United States to study large scale penicillin production. The other member of the team seems to have been recalled and disappeared; Borodin adopted what he called "a move of instinctive self preservation" by not returning to his native land. In spite of the mass executions, terror and blood-shed which he witnessed it is curious that he still adheres to the philosophy that all the violence and sacrifice was necessary for the happiness of future generations, a stand which is incomprehensible to those of the western world.

This volume is published by Constable of England and the price is 21 shillings.
